These enzymes play critical roles in pathogenic organisms, including both human and plant pathogens. Targeting them is an attractive strategy to combat infectious diseases. The process of type II secretion is responsible for the export of over 700 proteins from gram negative bacteria to eukaryotic hosts. The most commonly used model system for studying type II secretion is a secretion system encoded by the plasmid pT181. The proteins encoded by pT181 include the first bacteriophage gene product to be fully characterized. We are seeking to understand the mechanism of secretion and how it is utilized to deliver effector proteins from bacteria into the cytoplasm of host cells. The current focus of our research is on the phage tail tip protein, Tip.
